Presently, there is no native Photoshop plugin architecture. All third-party plugins must still be downloaded from the Web site. Many professionals would rather have native applications they can count on to work as advertised, especially critical plugins that are supposed to be in the same release as the operating system. Of course, since Photoshop is a graphics application with lots of features, the workflow really depends on the plugins used. Indeed, Adobe has been far too slow to update such plugins to work with newer versions of Photoshop, so many users are left running older versions of Photoshop. Not only has Adobe re-invented their Live Sharable Content feature with Share for Review (beta), only one other application does it independently. It is found in Rhythmbox, but it requires importing the file into InDesign. Photoshop, on the other hand, reads the file right out of InDesign or Preview. To make it even easier, the application has added a new feature to Preview: The Sketch feature, available using the Apple Pencil and following the pencil stroke forward or backward. The automatic zoom is particularly useful for some types of illustration, such as building blocks. I like the fact that Photoshop now recycles the page when finished. That saves screen space and is really helpful, however, the longer the page is made, the more slowly the application responds. This is particularly noticeable in the Sketch tool, which tends to be slower than most tools to be used.
