Although it is usually impossible to seamlessly turn one browser tab into another without closing the current browser tab, the ability to make this change using just a keyboard shortcut (Win + Tab) makes it much easier than earlier versions did. Another big improvement is the integration of the new web browser, Apple's Safari . This new browser has an integrated address bar, search box, autocomplete and - most importantly - a very fast loading web page. The Safari for iOS app has a great design and it operates like a Mac browser. An iPhone or iPad viewable with several panes (such as Panorama, Device and Album) makes it possible to check all of your social media apps like Instagram, or email and Twitter in a single interactive web view. I also like Safari's "History" list, which does not only show web pages, but also the apps I've previously opened. This is a great innovation, especially during the editing process. It's pretty limited, but sometimes that's a good thing. Different types of Paper have a lot of great features. For example, the PaperVision has a very nice feature to track any object in the image you wish to edit. Focus, Color Tint, and layer styles are all available. But the Papparatt does not have any special features that help editing. I can not pretend that I am an all-round photographer and Photoshop specialist, but I played with it at least a bit. And you can see that the iPad Pro has enough room for everything you need.
