How does Lightroom compare to Photoshop? Although Lightroom is free, it can easily be considered both a full-featured tool for organizing, reviewing and cataloguing your images. It can also be used to edit RAW and JPEG images. In essence, Lightroom is just a better version of Camera RAW. The key difference between Lightroom and Camera RAW is that in Photoshop you can realize many opportunities with only the right tool. With Lightroom, you are guided to this goal with the image and its metadata. In other words, while Lightroom is designed for photographers, the fact is that many users save RAW files with no real artistic intentions. This is the reason why Lightroom is built on the concept of an intelligent collection of metadata (data about data). As such, there is no need to combine the tool with the original RAW file with the intention of manipulating it. Yet, Lightroom already contains many powerful settings, such as white balance, exposure, contrast, sharpness, gamma, hue, saturation, noise and white balance. And it does this automatically for you. What is nice about Lightroom's software is that it is integrated with both Mac and Windows systems. It works on both the Internet and local computers through a number of different browsers. There are over 200 different possibilities, some of which are simply impossible in Photoshop. This is the reason why many photographers are very hesitant to switch over from Photoshop. In addition, software is well suited to work with a full range of devices, from large displays to ordinary notebooks with standard screens.
