The task of using Lightroom and Photoshop together can be complicated at first, but the time spent learning to master the software is well worth it. In my book, Lightroom is an editor and Lightroom Plus is an organizer. The two programs work well together when you make nice selections in Lightroom, because Lightroom will interact with Photoshop to mark out which parts are which, so that's how the two programs work most often. If you're looking to get better at making selections, Lightroom is the best place to begin. Photoshop is more powerful, but more expensive, so it's useful to use Lightroom for the editing you'll be doing, and then switch over to Photoshop when you need more complex work. In my case, I often explore new features in Lightroom before going to Photoshop, and after that, most of the time, I work in Photoshop. Lightroom is the wizard in Photoshop. Image adjustment sliders, click-and-drag selection tools, and special toning features to correct the color and exposure of your image. Work with multiple images in one project. Lightroom lets you quickly access the photos through its excellent browser view. Each panel and layer can be scrolled independently. You can even adjust toning with the clever Colour Sliders interface. And you get a separate browser for each image, so you can add in comments, tag the image, and make other arrangements. You can even keep one image open and edit a different image while you switch easily between them. Add camera corrections by importing a photo's EXIF data and applying them to the image too.

Of course, most Photoshop users don't view themselves as creative geniuses - but they strive to be their best. As experienced Photoshop users, they learn new techniques from the tools and learn to edit in unique ways around their work. Most professionals use Photoshop at least 5-10 hours per week. We do the math and five hours per week is about five years of use. If you have 30 years of work in your portfolio, the math also works out that you've probably used Photoshop for at least a dozen years. The value of a Photoshop user is truly immeasurable. A professional in any industry is always looking for a better way to do things, and is a better designer when they have access to the entire range of tools at their disposal. My Adobe username, age, number of work hours, hourly wage, and where I live are all things I have yet to publicly communicate, but I don't think they matter very much to anyone other than those of us who work on Photoshop. I can get a lot more exposure to new and valuable Photoshop tutorials in the daily routine running my own business. I can say that I'm proud to be an Adobe user, and am able to have a lot more fun in the process of my work. These days, the added support of video tutorials, courses, and online schools to help develop my skills mean I'm constantly learning how to improve my ideas. As a writer, I'm always looking to fine-tune my skills in the creative process, from developing the initial idea for a script to doing the additional research related to my work. e3d0a04c9c
